Steve Jobs and Apple

As a young man he looked far into the future and knew he had to make technology for everybody. That is why he thought Apple was the right brand name. He felt that this simple name would help people trust the new technology he was about to introduce to the world. He decided to attract young people because they were the customers of the future and his strategy was always to sell exciting, high-end products at a high price and profit. Steve Jobs saw clearly that brands are part of our culture and everyday lives and that everything a brand does is an ad – positive or negative – for that brand. Apple's customers are in a constant dialogue with Apple's products. They discover more and more clever functions as they use them. They can tell Apple about any problems and get regular updates to fix them. Steve Jobs left Apple in 1985 to make films and returned in 1997 when the company was fighting to survive. He rebuilt the brand and introduced a series of new products, for example the iPhone and the iPad.

Why was Apple the right name for his technology?

- This name was easy and would help people believe in his new technology.
- Because an apple is part of our everyday lives.
- Because Apple stands for exciting, high-end products at high price and profit.

Who did Steve Jobs want to be the buyers of Apple's products?

- He addressed people who could afford Apple's products.
- He wanted to attract young customers.
- He wanted everybody to buy Apple's products.
